The Brazilian Journal of Rheumatology (BJR) is turning 60! Time, which erodes and erases all, has helped to consolidate the name and reputation of the BJR, the official scientific dissemination vehicle of the Brazilian Society of Rheumatology (BSR). Today, at the age of 60, the BJR stoutly adheres to its mission of promoting the development of rheumatology through the publication and dissemination of scientific communication in the field.

The BJR is a collective endeavor. On its pages are engraved six decades of determined work by researchers, clinicians, editors, co-editors and reviewers, who have chiseled their scientific rigor, intuition and expertise into the journal. There are thousands of pages written by thousands of selfless hands with immense dedication to medicine and, in particular, to rheumatology. On this occasion, the BSR recognizes, applauds and thanks everyone for their contribution. Thank you very much!

As we celebrate the 60th anniversary of the BJR, we are glad to witness the youth of a sexagenarian publication that, over the years, has achieved success and the maturity to reinvent and reformulate itself, adapting to new times, new media and new formats while always ensuring that quality scientific information in rheumatology reaches all interested parties. Happy Birthday, BJR! Time has treated you well!

Georges Basile Christopoulos a,*, José Tupinamba S. Vasconcelos b

a President of Sociedade Brasileira de Reumatologia (SBR), São Paulo, SP, Brazil

b Scientific Director of the Sociedade Brasileira de Reumatologia (SBR), São Paulo, SP, Brazil

* Corresponding author.

E-mails: georgesbasile@icloud.com, christopoulos@uol.com.br (G.B. Christopoulos).

2255-5021/© 2017 Published by Elsevier Editora Ltda. This is an open access article under the CC BY-NC-ND license (http://creativecommons.org/licenses/by-nc-nd/4.0/).

Available online 3 August 2017