The decision taken by the League of Nations was received with bitterness by the Swedes and for a brief period upset relations, «otherwise excellent», between Sweden and Finland (Weibull, 1996, p. 124). In international circles, the decision was, on the contrary, greeted favourably for it introduced a peaceful way of regulating conflicts involving national minorities. The first plenary session of the Landsting, the first Åland parliament, took place on June 9, 1922 (Eriksson; Johansson; Sundback, 1995, p. 37).<sup>1</sup>
